This is where WINE and/or CrossOver can come in, but an alternative is to create a Linux LiveCD. By installing Linux on a hard disk instead of a CD, you can copy the entire operating system to the hard disk and then boot the system from there at any time. A couple of operating systems that run very well on LiveCDs are Linux and FreeBSD. One big problem is that you need a lot of space for the operating system. This is where LiveCD... Reviews: A new project with a new name: The Token.js library is going to have an important change. The initial design goals with Token.js was to create a simple API to securely send and receive data in the browser using tokens. With this release, the basic idea is now to create a simple API to securely send and receive data in the browser and handle binary data. This means that the Chrome extension that is created today is going to become a simple API that securely communicate with a server. Token.js is designed to handle all the complex things that comes with getting your data from the browser to your server, but it does it in a pretty simple way. You send data to the server by entering a URL into the Token URL field on the dashboard of the Chrome extension. The server takes care of the rest. The data is encrypted and signed to ensure a secure communication. Tokens can be either synchronous or asynchronous. Asynchronous tokens are something that is implemented in the basic API of Token.js, so if you already use asynchronous data sending via ajax and not via a browser extension, then the transition will be seamless. This is a preview release, and I'll be adding more functionality and improving the look of the API as I go along. I'm aiming for this project to be free and open source, so that everyone can contribute to it. This also means that I won't be charging users for it. I've been very busy with work lately, so I'm hoping that this is something that others will enjoy to use and contribute to. Any feedback is more than welcome! As usual, you can click on the image below to go to the github repo, where you can download the Chrome extension source code, as well as the documentation and the sample code.

All you need to do is use the clipboard. And that means putting anything on it: text, files, URLs, images, and so on.
